

Anthropology is the study of what makes us human. Anthropology draws and builds upon knowledge from the social and biological sciences as well as the humanities and physical sciences

Anthropology is unique among the social and behavioral sciences.

Anthropologists obtain data primarily from field research and comparative cross-cultural studies in time and space. As an academic discipline, anthropology is unique in its scope, addressing the broad range and diversity of human experience understood in its archaeological, biological and socio-cultural contexts.

---